Minnesota and the Bill of Rights

Marshall H. Tanick

Minnesota joined the rest of the nation in 1991 in commemorating the bicentennial of the Bill of Rights, the first ten amendments to the United States Constitution. When ratified in 1787, the Constitution created a nation. But not until four years later did citizens of the new country receive their most precious rights and liberties. Over the years, the Bill of Rights has been lauded as the cornerstone of freedom in America.

Minnesota was not even a concept, let alone a state, when the Bill of Rights was enacted. More than half a century passed before the land was designated a territory in 1849. But Minnesota has played a special role in the development of the Bill of Rights. The 1931 U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Near v. Minnesota brought the first ten amendments closer to all Americans and changed the course of the Constitution. This case marked its 60th anniversary during the Bill of Rights bicentennial year.

Until the Near ruling, the ten provisions—ranging from the fundamental freedom against government interference with religious activities to the more ambiguous concepts forbidding cruel and unusual punishment and guaranteeing the right of privacy—were considered applicable only to actions by the federal government. The vast workings of state and local governments were immune from the fundamental protections that the Bill of Rights accorded.

The Near case, which is ably chronicled in Fred Friendly’s book, Minnesota Rag, started out as a seemingly insignificant dispute between a community pariah and Twin Cities power brokers. It concerned a 1925 Minnesota statute that characterized “malicious, scandalous, and defamatory” newspapers and other periodicals as “public nuisances” and authorized each county attorney or any “reputable citizen” to seek an injunction to close them down. The legislation was used most forcefully against the Saturday Press, the Minneapolis newspaper of Jay M. Near, an unabashed bigot. The Press gleefully attacked and often slandered elected public figures, the media, organized-crime figures, racial and religious minorities, and other individuals and social institutions.

In 1927 Hennepin County Attorney Floyd B. Olson secured an injunction from district court under the public nuisance statute on grounds that the Saturday Press was malicious, scandalous, and defamatory. Two years later the Minnesota Supreme Court upheld the injunction against the publication.

The Near case wound its way up to the U.S. Supreme Court in 1930. On June 1, 1931, the Court ruled that the Minnesota statute authorizing injunctions against offensive publications violated the First Amendment protections.

Marshall H. Tanick is a Minneapolis attorney who specializes in civil litigation and constitutional law. His article “Freedom of the Press: Ten Minnesota Cases” appeared in the Fall 1987 issue of this journal.

Amendment provisions pertaining to freedom of speech and the press. By a bare five-to-four majority, the Court upheld the doctrine against prior restraint of the press. Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes's majority decision viewed the Minnesota public-nuisance law as unusual, if not unique.

Before reaching the merits of the case, however, the Court had to address a formidable obstacle: whether the First Amendment applied to the state measure. In Near, the Court for the first time directly ruled that the freedoms of the press and speech, guaranteed against infringement by the federal government, also are protected "from invasion by State action" through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. This theory, called incorporation, which is widely accepted today, represented a major innovation at the time.

Having determined that the First Amendment applies, the majority of the Court proceeded to the merits. The justices determined that the "purpose and effect" of the Minnesota statute were aimed at suppressing publication critical of "alleged derelictions of public officers." Thus, they reasoned, the law constituted "effective censorship" of controversial or unpopular opinions. Examining early English law and the origins of the U.S. Constitution, the majority concluded that this form of "previous restraint" violated the concept of freedom of the press.

The sole Minnesotan on the high court, Justice Pierce Butler, authored a vociferous objection, joined by three of his colleagues. Butler took aim at the incorporation doctrine, contending that the protections of the First Amendment and, presumably, the other provisions of the Bill of Rights, only limited the exercise of power by the federal government. While that proposition seems antiquated today, it represented a strong and widely accepted view at the time of the Near decision.

MANY OBSERVERS consider Near v. Minnesota to be one of the most important constitutional law cases ever decided. It is repeatedly cited and relied upon for the proposition that any prior restraint of publication or speech violates the First Amendment. The decision, however, was not absolute. The Court left room for prepublication censorship in "exceptional occasions in which speech or press may be suppressed in advance," such as preserving security in time of war, preventing the overthrow of government, and upholding vague notions of public morality. While these exceptions themselves have generated substantial litigation over the years, the basic principles of Near v. Minnesota remain cornerstones of constitutional law.

Despite its significance, Near's importance should not be overstated. Most state constitutions, including Minnesota's, contain rights and guarantees for citizens similar to those of the first ten amendments. Some state documents even afford broader rights than their federal counterparts.

Moreover, the incorporation theory did not immediately change American jurisprudence. It has been a long, slow struggle for the courts to come around to adopting particular provisions in the Bill of Rights to state and local units of government, a process that has consumed much of the past 60 years. Even today, a few provisions of the Bill of Rights, including certain jury practices, are not deemed applicable to the states.

One of the leading obstacles to Near's argument was a 1916 U.S. Supreme Court ruling on another Minnesota case. In Minneapolis & St. Paul Ry. Co. v. Bombolis, the Court rejected a claim that the Seventh Amendment right to a jury trial in civil cases requires unanimity in state court proceedings. By limiting the unanimity requirement to federal court cases, the Bombolis decision seemed to foreclose application of the Bill of Rights to the states, an unfavorable precedent for application of the First Amendment to the law at issue in the Near proceedings.
Minnesota Cases that Helped Shape the Constitution

Minnesota has contributed substantially to the development and evolution of personal rights and privileges under the U.S. Constitution. Here are ten other important Minnesota cases involving the Bill of Rights.

MINNEAPOLIS & ST. PAUL RY. CO. V. BOMBOLIS (1916): The U.S. Supreme Court rules that the Seventh Amendment's requirement of a unanimous jury verdict in civil trials applies only to federal court cases, not to state court litigation.

HEFFRON V. INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY OF KRISHNA CONSCIOUSNESS, INC. (1981): The U.S. Supreme Court upholds restrictions limiting distribution of written circulars about commercial, political, and religious issues at the Minnesota State Fair.

MUELLER V. EYANS (1983): The U.S. Supreme Court upholds the Minnesota parochial-aid law allowing tax deduction for payments for school tuition, textbooks, and transportation.

MINNEAPOLIS STAR & TRIBUNE V. MINNESOTA COMMISSIONER OF REVENUE (1983): Minnesota's special "use tax," imposed on the state's largest newspaper, is struck down by the Supreme Court as a violation of freedom of the press.

STANLEY V. MCGRATH (1983): A measure restricting financing of the Minnesota Daily, the University of Minnesota student newspaper, because of a controversial humor edition is stricken by the Eighth Circuit Court of Appeals as a violation of the First Amendment.

MINNESOTA V. MURPHY (1984): The Supreme Court allows statements made by a criminal defendant to a probation officer to be used as evidence against the individual in a subsequent criminal proceeding for an offense unrelated to the reason for probation.

ANDERSON V. CREIGHTON (1987): The U.S. Supreme Court entitles a St. Paul family to claim damages from the FBI for conducting an improper, warrantless search of their home in violation of the Fourth Amendment.

MINNESOTA V. OLSON (1990): The U.S. Supreme Court reverses the murder conviction of a Minneapolis man because of a violation of the Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable search and seizure, resulting from arrest while the suspect was hiding in a friend's northeast Minneapolis apartment.

HODGSON V. STATE (1990): The Minnesota law requiring both parents to be notified for a minor to obtain an abortion is stricken by the Supreme Court, but a statutory provision is upheld requiring judicial approval in the absence of parental notification and consent.

STATE V. HERSBERGER (1990): The Minnesota Supreme Court upholds Amish farmers' refusal on religious grounds to post state-prescribed warning signs on slow-moving wagons using public roads. This ruling construes the freedom of the press provision of the state constitution more broadly than that of the federal Constitution.

Nonetheless, Near ranks high in the pantheon of landmark legal decisions in the history of this country. Without it, many of the substantial advances made in human and civil rights over the past six decades would not have occurred. Because of it, the principal rights and freedoms of Americans do not differ across state or local boundary lines. Near gave new and significant meaning to the phrase "making a federal case" out of a legal dispute. It is fitting and proper to note its 60th anniversary as Minnesota unites with the rest of the nation in marking the bicentennial of the Bill of Rights.

The illustration on p. 324 is from the MHS collections.
Amendment I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Amendment II

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.

Amendment III

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

Amendment IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

Amendment V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Amendment VI

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.

Amendment VII

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law.

Amendment VIII

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

Amendment IX

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Amendment X

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.